

I would like to strongly urge a delay in the FCC vote on media consolidation until public views on this issue can be more fully assessed. US airwaves have been largely established as public property, and as such, changes in the rules governing use of these airwaves should substantially reflect public, rather than corporate opinions. Relaxing rules to allow media consolidation can only be justified by strong public opinion for this change, and a public desire for change has not yet been demonstrated.